During the senior year in high school, a buddy named Edward Fallis, had an automobile that was in need of a new tire. Since this was wartime, tires were not easy to find, so Ed had to become inventive.

In Danvers Square, a large pile of used tires was developing as people left their old tires for the war effort. As Ed drove by, he noticed the pile of tires. On one of his drives by the pile, he noticed what he thought was a better tire than the one that absolutely needed to be replaced on his car. So, at an opportune time, you guessed it---Ed swapped tires and rode on in greater safety.
